Globalization is changing our world in many ways. It is argued that when products, information and people easily move across borders, we become more similar and national identity then becomes less important. I can't agree with this idea.

Here in Japan, people watch Hollywood movies and even adopt English words like mansion. Does that make us less Japanese? I think not. We interpret the movies based on our values, not American values. And a mansion in Japan is a condominium, not a huge house. We may receive things from overseas, but they don't change our national identity.

We also see that some nations or groups have nationalistic reactions to the effects of global society. France regulates the amount of English in the mass media. We also see some ethnic groups react violently to what they perceive as threats from outsiders. It is obvious that people will defend their culture and their national identity.

In a global society, people move across borders more often. My own experience of traveling has helped me understand more about my culture and national identity.

As a member of today's global society, I don't feel my identity as a Japanese has been weakened at all. In fact, my experiences have strengthened my feelings of being Japanese. (210 words)
