< “Yes” Answer >

Throughout recorded history, humankind has used animals for food, clothing and even companionship. It's difficult to estimate the great value animals provide. Some people say we should pay more consideration to the rights of animals. I disagree.

Of course I don't think any animal should be tortured or needlessly mistreated. In many countries, including Japan, there are laws that prevent such mistreatment of animals.

Nevertheless, animals are a necessary resource. They provide us with food and clothing. Everywhere in nature we see that some animals devour others. It is a natural process, which should not be restricted by something abstract like the rights of animals.

In our society, we also see animals used as pets and in zoos. Our pets provide companionship, and even entertainment. What's wrong with that? The animals in zoos are valuable teaching tools for children. In the zoos they are studied and efforts are made to help endangered species. These are examples of how humans are helping animals.

I can't understand the thinking about animal rights. Does a jellyfish need rights? Humans have a moral obligation not to needlessly destroy or hurt animals, but I think it is unnecessary to apply any kind of rights to animals.

< “No” Answer >

We share this earth with many different kinds of animals. Humans are the most intelligent and, therefore, most powerful creature. But do the people of the world give the rights of animals enough consideration? I think the answer is no.

First, let's look at the pet industry. I realize many pets are pampered and receive the best of care. But others are beaten or kept in horrible conditions. Regardless of the level of care, is it right to keep animals as property?

Farmers and even corporations also own animals as property. Sometimes these animals are not allowed to move because their value is higher when they fatten up before slaughter. Isn't this a kind of torture? And of course animals that are used in experiments also undergo treatment that could be called torture.

Last, let's look at animals that are used as entertainment. The most obvious example of this is a zoo. I feel sad when I see the beautiful animals squeezed into their small cages and enclosures.

In conclusion, animals don't have the same rights as humans, but we should ensure that they don't needlessly suffer pain and imprisonment. Society needs to give more consideration to the rights of animals.
